

For the First Time in Recorded History:

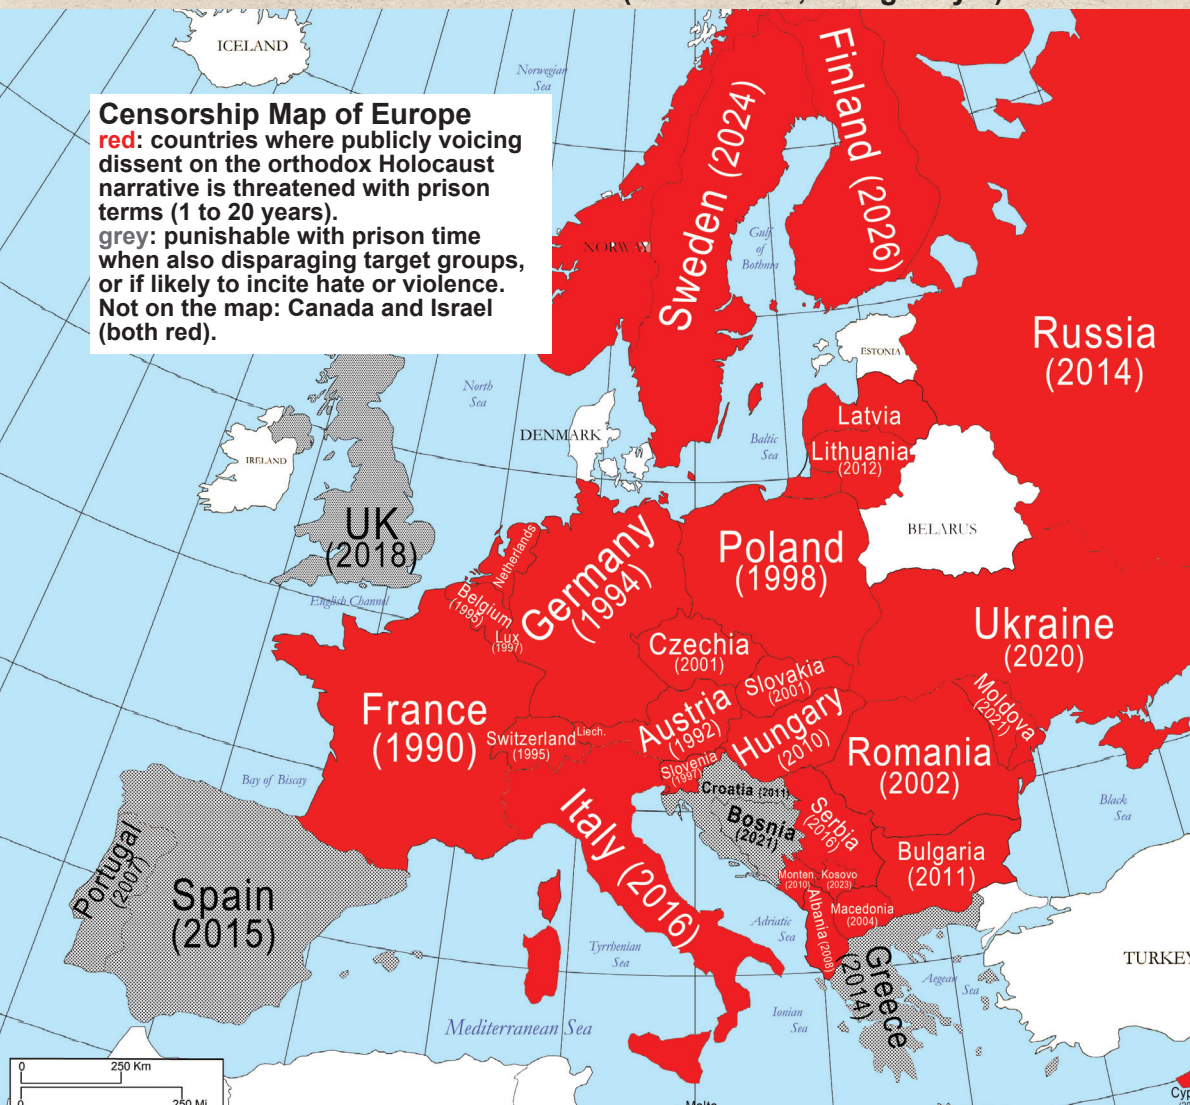

An Entire Civilization Dictates the Results of Research with Government Guns Drawn

In an interview of 1998, long-time head of the Auschwitz Museum's research department Wacław Długoborski admitted that he knew all along that the history of the Auschwitz Camp he helped writing was wrong, but excused it with having been threatened, until 1990, with "disciplinary measures" by his communist superiors.

Also in 1998, Poland introduced a law increasing government coercion for any dissent from "disciplinary measure" to "up to 3 years in prison."

When the USSR collapsed in 1989-91, Eastern archives and crime locations became freely accessible. What researchers found there made politicians pull the emergency break: By now, almost all Western countries have outlawed publishing research results on the Holocaust that contradicts the old Soviet narrative (not the U.S., though – yet):

Censorship Map of Europe
red: countries where publicly voicing dissent on the orthodox Holocaust narrative is threatened with prison terms (1 to 20 years).
grey: punishable with prison time when also disparaging target groups, or if likely to incite hate or violence.
Not on the map: Canada and Israel (both red).

* Israel Gutman (ed.), Encyclopedia of the Holocaust , 4 volumes, Yad Vashem, Jerusalem, 1990

Yad Vashem's pioneering 1990 encyclopedia dishes out a pre-packaged fast-food meal. It contains no information on the evidence their claims rest on: no results of forensic investigations, no summary of documented history, and no hint regarding which witness testimonies were used.

You need to use our work to learn about these things.

More modern mainstream efforts, such as the online encyclopedias of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum or Yad Vashem, are even worse, as their entries are more superficial and usually lack any references.

Wikipedia's pertinent entries are monitored by agents paid by Israel's government to suppress any red-pilling information.
